FISCAL DEFICITS THE NEW TREND FOR CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES?

The financial crisis of 2007-2009 and the deep and prolonged global recession that ensued have forced many developed countries to post dramatic increases in public deficits, with many of them experiencing their highest levels of debt since World War II. This was a result of governments being forced to intervene with fiscal stimulus packages and assist in bailouts, recapitalization and takeovers of banks and other financial institutions. The Keynesian view that governments should run deficits during a recession and periods of high unemployment to compensate for the lack of private demand and to stimulate the economy is the position that most governments have adopted since the onset of the recession in 2007. The countries that experienced the highest fiscal deficits because of the financial crisis are Iceland, Ireland, the UK, Greece, USA and Spain (Table1). Their projected deficits are still considerable.

Caribbean countries are currently in the same fiscal deficit position as the world's advanced economies; for some countries, in particular the tourism dependent economies the financial crisis has accentuated their struggle with fiscal imbalances and high debt levels. Figure 1 shows the Overall Fiscal Balance/GDP ratio for Caribbean economies over the period 2000-2010; most of them have reported fiscal deficits for the past 10 years. It is not surprising then that a number of Caribbean countries - Jamaica, Grenada, Antigua, Haiti, Belize, Dominica, SVG, SLU and SKN have recently accessed loans from the IMF to fund their shortfalls in revenue to finance their capital projects and fulfill the government's role of "economic stimulator" in this difficult economic environment. There are also countries-Guyana, Trinidad and Tobago and Suriname that have had stronger fiscal performances in the past but have experienced fiscal deficits and increases in debt because of the financial crisis. These three countries have projected fiscal deficits in their recent budget presentations for 2011/2012 (Figure 2) in part because they have adopted an expansionary fiscal policy strategy to sustain growth.

Having a fiscal deficit is not as bad as it appears to be. The problem with a fiscal deficit arises from the manner in which it is financed and the way the money is used. The question then is – how can the Caribbean economies continue along their projected growth path while they continue to be hindered by fiscal imbalances and high debt levels? One of the major problems that exist internationally as well as regionally, is the fact that governments have become the major contributor to GDP and by extension the driving force behind the country's economic growth since the onset of the financial crisis. If governments are to reduce their fiscal deficits by cutting expenditure, there is a high possibility the economies will experience lower, and in some cases negative, growth rates.

The IMF has highlighted the need for Caribbean economies to reduce public debt, increase savings and resist the pressure to increase wages and subsidies. Greater efforts are necessary to generate fiscal savings to stabilize and reduce public debt over the medium term as their debt sustainability analysis suggests that the average Caribbean country will need to increase its primary balance by at least four percentage points of GDP through a combination of revenue-raising and expenditure-cutting measures. The Caribbean economies' fiscal and debt issues are not that precarious when compared to the advanced economies; they require an eight per cent of GDP adjustment in the cyclically-adjusted primary balance over the next 10 years to stabilize and reduce debt levels.

Each Caribbean economy have unique challenges so an appropriate fiscal consolidation policy must be adopted by each country; the common link must be to have a fiscal plan that will enable the country to achieve meaningful fiscal savings and revenues, have expenditure reductions rather than tax-based consolidation and cuts in current spending rather than in capital spending. This would foster sustainability in the deficit and debt position of countries in the region, because a fiscal deficit that is a result of capital expenditure as opposed to current expenditure will have a positive impact on the economy in the long run.
